The word passed into Romanic: It. stallo place, stalla stable, OF. estal place, position, stall for merchandise, etc. (mod.F. étal butcher's stall). Several of the English senses were probably adopted from Anglo-French, but this is not absolutely certain.

The OTeut. stallo-, according to the now prevailing view, represents an older staðlo-, f. root sta-* to Stand. The pre-Teut. form of the suffix may have been either -dhlo- or -tlo-; on the former supposition the word would correspond formally to L. stabulum Staale sb.; on the latter it would be a variant of staplo-* Staddle sb.]

The OE. stǽl (the quantity of which is certain from the three occurrences in poetry) appears not to be immediately connected with the synonymous stæl with short vowel (dat. stale); according to some scholars it represents a contraction of OTeut. staþl-* or stadl-*, the relation of OE. stǽl to staðol foundation (see Staddle sb.) being considered parallel with that of mæl speech to the synonymous mæðel. The 13th c. form staðelwurðe, occurring only once (see 3 ð) strongly confirms this view.

(? obs.) stempfen :—OTeut. type stampjan*; cf. MLG., mod.G. stempel, MHG. stempfel stamp, die. The Teut. stamp-* is the source of the Com. Rom. verb represented by It. stampare to tread, press, print, Pr., Sp., Pg. estampar to stamp, print, OF. estamper (mod.F. estamper, in some technical senses étamper) to stamp; whence the verbal noun It. stampa press, printing-press, Sp., Pg. estampa, F. estampe engraving, estampe, étampe stamp, die.

The view stated above seems on the whole more likely than the alternative supposition that the verb did not exist in OE., but is solely an adoption of OF. estamper (see above). At the same time there can be little doubt that the sense-development of the Eng. verb has been influenced by the uses of its Fr. cognate.

The Teut. root stamp-* is prob. a nasalized form of stap-* to tread; if so the primary sense of the verb would seem to be that of branch II below, from which the other senses might easily be derived. Some scholars regard the root (pre-Teut. stomb-*) as cogn. w. Gr. στέμβ-ειν ? to shake, ? to maltreat (occurring only once); radical connexion with STUMP sb. has also been suggested.]

Stand (stænd), v. Forms: see below. [A Com. Teut. strong verb, in most of the Teut. langs. more or less defective, certain parts being supplied by a synonymous defective verb from the same ultimate root (see below). The OE. standan (stondan), pa. t. stód, stódon, pa. pple. gestanden, corresponds to OFris. stónda, pa. t. pl. stódon, pa. pple. stenden; OS. standan, pa. t. stôd (stuod), stôdun (stuodun), pa. pple. -standan; MLG. imp. stant, pa. t. stôt, stôden, also nasalized stunt, stunden (mod.LG. pa. t. stund, stunden); MDu. standen, pa. t. stond, stonden, Flem. stoet, stoeden, pa. pple. †gestanden (mod.Du. pa. t. stond, stonden); OHG. stantan, pa. t. stuont, pl. stuondum, -stuotun, pa. pple. -stantan (MHG. inf. rare standen, pa. t. stuont, pa. pple. gestanden; mod.G. imp. †stand, pa. t. stand, pl. standen, earlier †stund(e etc., pl. †stunden etc., pa. pple. gestanden); ON. standa, pa. t. stóþ, pl. stóþom, pa. pple. staþenn (Norw. standa, pa. t. stod, pa. pple. stadet, stande etc.; MSw. standa, pa. t. stóþ, pl. stópo, pa. pple. standin, also staþin; mod.Sw. pa. t. stod, pl. stodo, pa. pple. stånden; Da. †stande, stonde, pa. t. stod, pl. stode, pa. pple. †standet); Goth. standan, pa. t. stôþ, pl. stôþum (pa. pple. unrecorded).

In OTeut. the forms of the verb were probably as follows: pres.-stem stand-, perfect sing. stôþ-, plural stôđ-; formed, with suffix -nd- (:—pre-Teut. -nt-) in the present-stem, and-þ-, đ (:—pre-Teut. -t-) in the perfect stem, on the root sta-* : stō-:—Indogermanic st(h)ɔ-* : st(h)ā-, found in all branches of the family exc. Armenian and Albanian with the senses 'to stand', 'to cause to stand': cf. Skr. sthā (pres. ind. tiṣṭhati, inf. sthātum), Avestic hištaiti, Gr. ἵστάναι, L. stāre, sistĕre, Lith. stojù-s I set myself, OSl. stojati, stati, OIrish táu, tó I am (:—OCeltic stāō*).

In Ger. and Dn. the n of the present stem has within historical times passed into the pa. t. The pa. pple., which this vb. prob. did not possess in OTeut., has been variously supplied in the different langs.: the type staðono-*, which conforms to the general rule of the a, ō conjugation, is represented in ON., Norw., MSw.; the other Teut. langs., so far as they do not take their pa. pple. from the shorter form of the verb (see below) have a formation based on the present stem, as in OE. (ge)standen. In English the regular form of the pa. pple., standen (with the variants stande, etc.) continued until the 16th c., when its place was taken by stood from the pa. t. A few examples of a weak form standed occur in writings of the 16th c.; in compounds (understanded, withstanded) this formation was less rare, and survived into the 17th c.

In all the Teut. langs. exc. English, Gothic, and Old Norse, the present stem has a shorter form, the OTeut. type of which varies between stai-* and stē-* (WGer. stā-); in some of the langs. this is used exclusively, and in others along with the longer form stand-. In some of the languages the earlier form of pa. pple. has been wholly or partially superseded by a new formation from the shorter present stem. The dialectal range of the shorter type will appear from the following list of typical forms (minor variations heing omitted): OS. inf. stān (rare; MLG. inf. stān, pa. pple. gestān; mod.LG. inf. staan, pa. pple. staan), OLow Frankish inf. stân (MDu. inf. staen, 3 pres. ind. staet, steet, pa. pple. gestaen; mod.Du. inf. staan, pa. pple. gestaan); OFris. inf. stân, stên, 3 pres. ind. steet, pa. pple. stên (WFris. inf., 1 pres. ind. stean); OHG. inf. stân, stên (MHG. inf. stân, stên, mod.G. stehen, stehn); MSw. inf. stå (mod.Sw. stå, pa. pple. wk. stådd); Da. inf. staa, pa. pple. staaet; Norw. inf. staa, pres. staar, stær.

The remarkable parallel between the verbal stems stā-, stai-, stand-* and gē-, gai-, gang-* (see Go, Gang vbs.) strongly suggests that one of the two series has been assimilated to the other. The relation between the two, however, and the precise mode of formation of the shorter verbal stems from the roots, is very uncertain. For an outline of the different views, with references, see Deutsches Wb. ('Grimm') X. II. 1433.]

See also ESTANDARD. [aphetic a. OF. estandard, -art, -esterdard, -art (mod.F. étendard) = med.L. standardum, -us, standarium, etc., Pr. estandard, -art, Sp., Pg. estandarte, It. stendardo; according to most scholars f. com. Rom. estend-ere (L. extend-ĕre to stretch out: see EXTEND v.) + -ARD; a parallel synonymous formation with different suffix is It. stendale, late OF. estandale, -deille (med.L. standale, -ālis). The Fr. word has passed into all the living Teut. langs.: MHG. stanthart (by popular etymology, as if 'stand hard'), later standart, standert (mod.G. standarte), MDu. standaert (mod.Du. standaard, standerd), Da. standart, Sw. standar.

The origin of sense 9 ('standard of measure or weight'), whence the other senses in branch II are derived, is somewhat obscure. It appears in AF. (estaundart) and Anglo-L. (standardus) in the 13th c., two centuries earlier than our earliest vernacular instance. It has not been found in continental OF.; the use of Dn. standaard in this sense is believed to be imitated from English. It is noteworthy that in early instances the standard of measure is always either expressly or by implication called 'the king's standard', an expression which belongs to the older sense 1. It seems probable that sense 9 is a fig. use of sense 1; the king's standard being the point of reunion of the army, and the centre from which commands are issued.

The senses grouped as branch III are of doubtful, probably of various and in some instances of mixed origin. The notion of 'something conspicuously erected', involved in sense 1, would account for several of them; others may be referred to the idea of 'something permanent, fixed, or stationary', generalized from sense 9. Etymological association with STAND v. has, however, certainly affected the whole group, and it is possible that in some uses the word should be regarded as an alteration of STANDER. The senses of this branch are almost confined to English: OF. has estandart some kind of torch (rare$^{-1}$), and WFlem. has standaart mill-post (De Bo; standaert, Kilian); but the relation of these to the English uses is obscure.]

I. A military or naval ensign.

1. A flag, sculptured figure, or other conspicuous object, raised on a pole to indicate the rallying-point of an army (or fleet), or of one of its component portions; the distinctive ensign of a king, great noble, or commander, or of a nation or city.

† Standard-general: the principal standard of an army.

In Eng. the word appears first with reference to the 'Battle of the Standard' in 1138. A cootemporary writer, Richard of Hexham, relating the story of the battle, describes the 'standard' there used as a mast of a ship, with flags at the top, mounted in the middle of a machine which was brought into the field. He quotes a Latin couplet written on the occasion, which says that the standard was so called from 'stand', because 'it was there that valour took its stand to conquer or die'.

2. In a more restricted sense, a military or naval flag of some particular kind.

Ordinarily, the standard is understood to be distinguished from a banner by being long and tapering instead of square, and from a pennon by its greater breadth. The British royal standard, however, which is flown when the king or a member of the royal family is present, is now a square flag (thus technically a 'banner'), divided into four compartments bearing the emblems of England (twice), Scotland, and Ireland. In the British army, the regimental flags of the cavalry are called standards, those of the infantry being 'colours'. In the U.S. army the flag of a cavalry regiment is called its standard.

The corrupt form stallion (quot. 1601 in 1 a) may have had dialectal currency; cf. the converse mispronunciation staniel for stallion, which is common in rustic speech. The spurious forms standgale, -gall, given in some recent dictionaries, are evolved from the etymologizing conjecture 'stand-in-gale' (Swainson, Prov. Names of Birds). The alleged Ger. synonym steingall, commonly cited by etymologists as cognate, is of doubtful genuineness. The 19th c. lexicographers seem to have obtained it, directly or indirectly, from the Vocabula of Peucer and Eber (1549). But although in this glossary the word is treated as German, its source appears to be William Turner's Avium Historia (Cologne 1544), where steingall is said to be the English word for tinnunculus. Turner's steingall prob. represents steingall*; Gesner (1555) says that it is northern English. The English ornithologists of the 17th c., following Gesner, give steingall as an English name of the bird; Willughby's stone-gall is an etymologizing alteration of this.]

The kestrel, Tinnunculus alaudarius. Also applied contemptuously to a person, in allusion to the uselessness of the kestrel for the purposes of falconry. (Cf. Kestrel b.)

In the 16th c. stapes was regarded as the standard Latin word for stirrup (for which there was no word in classical Latin, as stirrups were not used by the ancients); it is in Estienne, Cooper, and two Latin-Ger. dictionaries cited by Diefenbach. Du Cange has one example of stapes, and one each of stapedium (1314), stapeda, and strapes. The word may perh. be an alteration of med.L. stapha, staffa (=It. staffa stirrup), after L. stāre to stand and ped-em, pēs foot.]

1. The innermost of the three ossicles in the tympanum of the ear in mammals; named from its stirrup-like shape.

The Sicilian anatomist J. Ph. Ingrassia (died 1580), in his posthumous notes to Galen De Ossibus (1603), claims the discovery of this bone, and says that he called it stapha, but others, more solicitous about Latinity, preferred stapes or strapeda. In 1564 Eustachius (De Auditus Organis, Opusc. Anat. 153) asserts that he made the discovery before Ingrassia did, and states that some call the ossicle staffa or stapes.

The (M)LG., (M)Du. stapel, and hence the G. and Sw. stapel, Da. stabel, have the sense 'emporium, mart', in addition to the senses mentioned under the preceding sb. It is, however, uncertain whether this sense was developed in MLG., or whether it originated in OF., and was thence adopted into MLG. The precise relation of this sense to the other senses of the Teut. word is also uncertain. It has been usually held to have been developed from the sense 'heap, pile'. This is not impossible; but, on the other hand, in the Frankish laws regis stapulus meant the place where the king or his representative administered judgement; the original notion may have been that of 'raised platform'. The transition would be easy from the Frankish sense of regis stapulus to that of the 'king's staple' for the collection of duties on merchandise.]

1. A town or place, appointed by royal authority, in which was a body of merchants having the exclusive right of purchase of certain classes of goods destined for export; also, the body of merchants so privileged. Now only Hist.

The English word has not been found earlier than 1423; the AF. estaple and the Anglo-L. stapula, however, occur in statutes and official documents from the reign of Edw. II onwards, and these contain evidence that the institution of the staple was of older date. Each staple had a mayor and constables, appointed by the king, and in early times distinct from the municipal authorities, though latterly the mayor of some boroughs was ex officio mayor of the staple. At various times the chief staple was oversea, usually at Bruges or Calais; from about 1390 to 1558 it was at Calais, which is often called 'The Staple'. There were also staples in many important towns of England, Wales, and Ireland, the list of which varied greatly at different periods. Statute of the Staple: the ordinance 27 Edw. III (1353), which established staples in various English towns, and at Carmarthen, Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Drogheda, and contained regulations for their form of government and the conduct of their business. The notion, made popular by Blackstone, that the chamber had been the depository of 'starrs' or Jewish bonds (see Staar) has no claim to consideration.]

2. (More fully Court of Star-chamber.) A court, chiefly of criminal jurisdiction, developed in the 15th c. from the judicial sittings of the King's Council in the Star Chamber at Westminster. The judges were the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy Seal, and any peers that chose to attend. The rules of procedure of the court rendered it a powerful instrument in the hands of a sovereign or a ministry desirous of using it for purposes of tyranny, and the abuse of it under James I and Charles I have made it a proverbial type of an arbitrary and oppressive tribunal. It was abolished by an Act of the Long Parliament in 1641.

Stare (stēəɹ), v. Pa. t. and pa. pple. stared (stēəɹd). Also 6 stayre, staar. [OE. starian, corresp. to (M)LG., Du. staren, OHG. starên (MHG. starn), ON. stara (Norw. stara), f. OTeut. staro-* (see Stareblind a.).

In mod.Ger. the vb. has disappeared, being merged in the cognate vb. starren (OHG. starrên) to be rigid; the sense 'to look fixedly, stare' being capable of being regarded as a particular application of the general meaning. A vb. of identical meaning, and prob. cognate, though the phonological relation is obscure, exists in several Tent. langs.: ON. stira (Da. stirre, Sw. stirra), mod.G. stieren.]

1. intr. To gaze fixedly and with eyes wide open. Said also of the eyes. Const. in mod. use chiefly at (also in indirect passive), in (a person's face), and occas. after, into, through; formerly (now arch.) on, upon. Also with advs. about, around, or advb. phr. denoting direction.

In modern use the verb ordinarily implies rudeness, or is otherwise disparaging; hence many of the older examples would now be differently expressed.

The ME. sterte (whence mod. Eng. start) is, so far as it is a southern form, explicable as the Kentish representative of OE. styrtan, whence in other ME. dialects sturte, stirte, etc. But the occurrence of sterte in early northern English, and of its normal phonetic descendants in mod. Other derivatives of the root are START sb.[1] (f. start-*), OE. steartlian (f. start-*) to stumble: see STARTLE v. No cognates outside Teut. are known.]

Starvation (stāɹvē·ɪ·ʃən). [f. Starve v. + -ation. Except flirtation (1718), this is the oldest of the many sbs. in -ation formed on native Eng. vbs.

App. first used with reference to the bill of 1775 'for restraining Trade and Commerce with the New England Colonies', which the Opposition denounced as intended to combat the rebellion by producing a famine in which the innocent would suffer equally with the guilty. The remark of Mr. Dundas (Hansard's Deb., 6 March 1775), that he was 'afraid' that the famine spoken of 'would not be produced by this Act', excited great indignation, and in 1781–2 Walpole and Mason call him by the nicknames 'Starvation Dundas' and 'Starvation'. The statement of Mitford (Corr. Walpole & Mason, 1851, II. 396) that Dundas himself used the word is in itself not improbable, but appears to lack confirmation. The verb starve occurs several times in the reports of speeches on the bill, but the sb. does not appear.]

WGer. str. verb, which has become weak in mod.Eng.: OE. steorfan (pa. t. stearf, pl. sturfon, pa. pple. storfen) corresponds to OFris. sterva (WFris. stjerre, NFris. sterwe), OS. sterban, (M)LG., (M)Du. sterven, OHG. sterban (MHG., mod.G. sterben), to die, f. Tent. root sterƀ-* (: starƀ-* : sturƀ-*).

A root of identical form, and possibly of identical origin, occurs in ON. stiarfe wk. masc., ? epilepsy, stiarf-r, stirfinn obstinate, starf toil, effort, starfa to toil. It has been suggested that the primitive sense of the root may have been 'to be rigid', which might account both for the sense 'to die' of the WGer. verb and for the meanings of the ON. words. On the other hand, as the Teut. form may equally well represent pre-Teut. sterp-* and sterbh-*, it is possible that the WGer. and the ON. words may be unconnected.

The conjugation of the verb has remained strong in the continental Teut. langs. In English the strong forms of the pa. t. became obsolete in the 15th century, and those of the pa. pple. in the 16th c. The transitive (causative) use, which arose in English in the 16th c., is not paralleled in the other langs.]

d. A tradesman who sells writing materials and similar articles. Cf. Law-stationer.

The sale of parchment, paper, pens, ink, etc. was originally a regular branch of the business of the 'stationer' or bookseller. The restriction of the term stationer to the dealer in these articles is first evidenced in quot. 1656; it had probably been in vogue in accurate mercantile parlance some time before, but was not established in ordinary use until the 18th century. Phillips (ed. Kersey 1706) s.v. Stationers, has the term paper-stationer.

1656 Blount Glossogr., Stationer..is often confounded with Book-seller, and sometimes with Book-binder; whereas they are three several Trades; the Stationer sells Paper and Paper-Books, Ink, Wax, etc. The Book-seller deals onely in printed Books, ready bound; and the Book-binder binds them, but sells not. Yet all three are of the Company of Stationers. 1755 Johnson, Stationer,..2. f. The Company of Stationers (or the Stationers' Company): one of the Livery Companies of the City of London, fonnded in 1556, comprising booksellers, printers, bookbinders, and dealers in writing materials, etc. Stationers' Hall: the hall of the Stationers' Company, at which a register of copyrights is kept. (The Copyright Act of 1842 provided that no action for breach of copyright could be brought nnless the work had been entered in this register. The Copyright Act of 1911 abolished this rule.)

The charter of 1556 (ed. 1741, p. 6) is thus worded: 'Volumus, damus, et concedimus..Thomæ Dockwray..[names of the Wardens and Freemen] Liberis Hominibus Misteræ sive Artis Stationarii Civitatis Nostre Londinensis..quod de cetero sint..Unum Corpus de se in perpetuum [etc]'.

An earlier guild of stationers is said to have been established in London in 1403: see quot. 1529 in 1.

Stationers' Reg.* (1875) I. 322 All Bookes to be so forfaited, shall be brought into the Stationers hall in London. 1709 Act 8 Anne c. 21 § 2 Before such Publication be entred in the Register Book of the Company of Stationers. 1765 Bickerstaff's Maid of Mill Advt., This Opera is entered at Stationers Hall, and whoever presumes to Print the Songs, or any Part of them, will be prosecuted by the Proprietors. 1790 J. The earliest known occurrence of the word seems to be in the title of the satirical work Microscopium Statisticum, by 'Helenus Politanus', Frankfort (?), 1672. Here the sense is prob. 'pertaining to statists or to statecraft' (cf. STATISTICAL a. 1). The earliest use of the adj. in anything resembling its present meaning is found in mod.L. statisticum collegium, said to have been used by Martin Schmeizel (professor at Jena, died 1747) for a course of lectures on the constitutions, resources, and policy of the various States of the world. The G. statistik was used as a name for this department of knowledge by G. Achenwall in his Vorbereitung zur Staatswissenschaft (1748); the context shows that he did not regard the term as novel. The F. statistique sb. is cited by Littré from Bachaumont (died 1771); Fr. writers of the 18th c. refer to Achenwall as having brought the word into use. The sense-development of the word may have been influenced by the notion that it was a direct derivative of L. status STATE sb.]

In England, Scotland, and Ireland, statute is in general synonymous with 'Act of Parliament' (see, however, quot. 1765), but the designation is applied also to certain early enactments by the king and his council before the rise of regular parliaments.

I. To take dishonestly or secretly.

1. trans. To take away dishonestly (portable property, cattle, etc., belonging to another); esp. to do this secretly or unobserved by the owner or the person in charge. Const. from (earlier dative).

The notion of secrecy (cf. STEALTH) seems to be part of the original meaning of the vb., which, however, is also employed in a generic sense applicable to open as well as secret acts of theft. In mod. use it takes the place of REAVE v.[1] 5, ROB v. 5, and of combinations like 'to steal and reave'.

6. The vapour into which water is converted when heated. In popular language, applied to the visible vapour which floats in the air in the form of a white cloud or mist, and which consists of minute globules or vesicles of liquid water suspended in a mixture of gaseous water and air. (Also sometimes applied to the vapour arising from other liquids when heated.) In modern scientific and technical language, applied only to water in the form of an invisible gas.

The invisible 'steam', in the modern scientific sense, is, when its temperature is lowered, converted into the white vapour called 'steam' in popular language, and this under continued cooling, becomes 'water' in the liquid form.

1. A general name for certain artificially produced varieties of iron, distinguished from those known as 'iron' by certain physical properties, esp. greater hardness and elasticity, which render them suitable as material for cutting instruments, and for various other industrial purposes.

Chemically steel is a nearly pure iron, the proportion of other substances varying from less than 1 to 3 per cent. Formerly 'steel' could be defined as containing more carbon than wrought iron, and less than cast iron; but since about 1860 the name has been extended to certain products containing very little carbon.
